Essay 1 : Commitment to ideals, not idols, is the need of the hour.

After Independence, when constitution was drafted, constitution makers faced dilemma on multitude of its issues. Thus they decided to seek guidance of none other than Gandhi ji himself. Gandhi has been the idol figure of Indian freedom struggle and masses had followed him obidience and were ultimately rewarded with independence. They wanted the presence of their idol in constituent assembly but Gandhi instead gave them 'Talisman'.

Gandhi was aware that his presence would make them dependent on independent nation dependent on its independence idol. But a reliance on ideals as pious as Talisman would make India truly Independent.

So was 'Talisman' greater than Gandhi? No, but lasted more than Gandhi and even continue to guide India. This story bring us to certain fundamental question - Why masses rely on idols to guide them? What makes ideals superior to idols? How are they in the debate relevant in contemporary times? How can we ensure that we are guided by correct ideals?

Let us try to understand each aspect of the debate through this essay.

Idols : The crowd puller

History testifies that across the lands, time and again arose few who were like others, lived among them but rose above to become Idols.

India has been a remarkable land with a long history of such leaders, right from time of Gautama Buddha, to B.R Ambedkar to Mahatma Gandhi.

These leaders have a certain charisma, an aura around their personalities which draw crowds towards them. Their ideas have a deep impact on psyche of masses and are mobilised to serve the greater goal under the able guidance of such leaders. For instance the Indian freedom struggle rode the wave of non-violent mass movement; when Gandhi ji time and again urged the movement to stay non violent - eg Chauri Chaura. Thus it is easier to be led by an able leader where it is less demanding on personal conscience of masses.

This type of mass following is visible in contemporary times also in massive rallies and supports of electoral leaders. Here the cult obey their leader unquestioningly.

Shortcoming of a cult belief

Though powerful mobilisation is aroused, and is disciplined for their leaders. But these masses and cult lack an insight into the ideology of their leaders and into their own conscience. This adds a temporary dimension to all such movement and take away any potential for long lasting impacts. Like the contemporary religious leaders and their masses drift away with the change of leaders. These are no match to idea driven origin of Buddhism and Jainism.

Why Ideas outshine Idols

As Gandhiji gave Talisman, Buddha gave Ashthangik path and Krishna gave Gita; true leaders understand the indispensable nature over idea ideas which individuals can never match.

Ideals last longer than people. Buddhism which saw its origin on ~~in~~ India has hardly any traces of its ancient might. This shows the mortal nature of humans and perishability of history. But despite of this Buddhism and its ideas continues to dominate Sri Lanka, South East Asia, Japan, etc. This shows the immortality of ideas.

Ideals does not ask us to imbibe all the qualities of Idols but only those which can set society on progressive path. For instance if contemporary feminists start analysing Gandhiji's ideas on feminism there will be numerous instances of distaste. But this does not diminish the stature of Ideas of Ahimsa. Thus they allow ~~us~~ us to be believers of good qualities, but at the same time keep space for critical analysis of personalities. Actually no one is infallible, not even idols.

If anything can match the indubility of ideals, it is the vast reach they can have. Thinkers like Locke, Rousseau never crossed the Suez canal to reach India. But in contemporary times India stand tall with its democracy and ideals of liberty and fraternity and continues to guide the world. It is a fact unachievable for any human, but no one can stop an idea's spread whose time has come..

Contemporary times: A time in need of Ideals.

Now let us analyse the issues of contemporary times where we see an absence of leaders but where ideals can have reckoning.

Antidefection law was passed to put a curb on unholly defection and deduction of duty towards citizens. But this law has proved ineffective to curb the use of money and muscle power. This can be clearly gauged from the case of Kottayam, Karnataka and Sikkim legislatures.

Thus no law, no man can be strong enough to stop a corrupted cause, but a man with values can never be corrupted. Thus the remedy for Antidilution law is not in its strengthening but in building a conscience which does not necessitate such laws.

At recent RCEP negotiations, Government of India backed out at the last moment of negotiations. RCEP was touted as one of the largest trade block of this time and would have given India diplomatic, strategic and some trade advantages. But in its immediate period it threatened the livelihood of millions of small and marginal farmers, dairy owners, MSME workers, etc. Prime minister said that his conscience does not permit him to go against Gandhis Talisman.

which asks every Indian to prioritise the needs of poorest face they have seen - over everything else. Thus though Gandhi was not here to guide us, but his ideals always stayed with us..

Recent years have seen an increase in incidences of communal violence and hate crimes such as lynching. This is a pressing time for the leaders as those entrusted with the responsibility have abdicated and denounced themselves. While those trying to fight are pushed down by branding as Antinational. It is true that today we lack leaders like Nehru and Gandhi who can stand against the masses and tell them that what they conspire is wrong. Does this mean that aims will go unbatteD? No, these leaders have left behind a rich legacy of ideals enshrined in the constitution and strong institutions. These institutions have guided politically neutral civil servants who continue to hold the pieces together in spite the tremendous pressure of populism against them.

They are the bulwark, a gumination of legacy created by ideals and not idols

Also in recent times there has been an increase in the incidences of rape, sexual harassment ex Nilbhaya case. What happened after incident is inspiring. No, there was no 'Govinda' movie type hero entry to save the women and neither was needed. But came out common men, and flooded streets of Delhi, all bound together by common ideas to save the dignified dignity of women

Thus both historically and contemporarily there have been plethora of incidences which prove that ideals have played a significant role. But the ideals that they have left behind played a greater, timeless and widespread role of revolution and immortalised even the idols.

After understanding how ideals can guide us in the dilemma of contemporary situation, the question which arises is, which ideals to pursue to?

The choice of ideals is equally perplexing as the options and dilemma of situations. But we Indians are lucky in this situation. We have our Constitution to guide us.

High standard of ideals: Constitutional ethos

Preamble of Constitution provides us with a list of ideals like democracy, secularism, liberty, justice, etc which have to be adhered to constitute India into a land of ideals. This even guides supreme court in constitutional interpretation as told in Kesavananda Bharti case.

Fundamental Rights provides a set of limitations upon the power of state and thus provide a well laid sphere for individual freedom.

Directive principles of state policy provides direction to government to adopt a welfare approach for development of India. It is a very comprehensive list and range from economic equitability to education and health of children, from protection of wildlife to safeguarding of monuments. Thus they aim to ensure that goals of society remain welfare only.

Fundamental duties are a set of guideline for the citizens to understand their moral responsibility. They aim to promote spirit of scientific temper, brotherhood, sensitivity to environment, wildlife, etc.

Thus Indian constitution is the most comprehensive constitution in the world asking its citizens to uphold the ideals in every situation, even if they have idol to guide or not.

In the end, whatever may be the situation, however dark may be the crisis;

'One who seeks light, Sun will guide him'

Essay 2 : The worst form of Inequality is to try to make unequal things equal.

In Ashutosh Gowariker's flick, Lagaan, there is a story about Bhuvan (Amit Khan) who was challenged by Britishers for a cricket match.

Though Britishers portray this as duel on equal grounds with equal chances to win. But as the protagonist begins to practise for match he realises that though the match is of equality but his past discrimination puts him on an unequal footing. In this gloomy situation a hope appeared with the arrival of British women who promises to teach them how to play test cricket. Thus a form of affirmative action and this places our heroes on equal footing to British team and they go on to win the match.

Thus the offer of match on equal ground for unequally placed people was not promotion of equality but perpetuation of inequality.

This example of movie though appears out of context but in reality exemplifies the game of cricket going on in Indian society. In this essay we will try to understand the essence of equal treatment to unequal and the need of equity felt during time of Independence. Also we will progress to understand the changed dynamics of Indian society and inequality in it. In the end we analyse the need of strongheaded, Ambedkar type reform.

Post independence debates : equality vs equity

India at time of Independence stand at a highly divided society where one section had strengthened at the cost of oppression of other section, the so called 'lower cast'. This brought up the biggest dilemma on how to continue the fight for egalitarian society initiated during freedom struggle.

Proponents of equality suggested that there is a need to forget past injustices and lay the foundation of independent India as an egalitarian society.

They gave the idea of universal adult suffrage.

for India and with this aimed to insure political equality. They believed that political equality would transform into economic and social dimensions too.

But proponents of equity which included B.R. Ambedkar refuted this transformative approach from political to social & economic dimension

They described the discrimination in society as a deeply entrenched feature and need a proactive affirmative action of state to alter the dynamics. Thus apart from political equality they promoted a policy of reservation from lower sections of society to strengthen them financially. Ensured job and monetary income would lead them to transform Indian into ~~a~~ a society of equals.

Thus they understood that any attempt to bring unequal people at equal platform of competition without providing a positive discrimination in favour of oppressed class, will only perpetuate inequality.

This was a path breaking decision and has laid the foundation stone of transformation which India has experienced in all these years.

Positive discrimination and modern growth factors like urbanism and industrialisation have together transformed the urban landscape and stirred the rural division. A country where its President comes from a so called backward class, there can be no better example of transformation.

But is the goal of constitution James of having egalitarian society realised? To understand

Let us understand the answer of this question by analysing the present construct of society.

21th Century Indian Society : An incomplete dream of inequality

Looking at the present construct of Indian society one can easily understand that transformation has not removed the hierarchy across divisions but it has dispersed the hierarchy with different layers in different sections

In contemporary rural hinterland, the social construct of caste system has continued unabated. • Here cases of caste violence, manual scavenging, etc continue. Thus rural landscape has escaped the transformation experienced in the cities.

Second contrasting situation is of 'class within caste'. In the positive discrimination policy of state only few select families continued to benefit and they became entrenched in the privileged section of society altering the traditional construct. But the rest of the oppressed section of society continues to live in perpetuity even after reservation benefit being open to them.

Reason for the same can be traced in the dictum 'equal treatment in unequal situations' perpetuate inequality. As the unprivileged sections were made to compete with the privileged lower caste for seats of reserved category and thus fared poorly.

Third situation lies in the 'upper caste' which are now left with a 'lower class within upper caste'.

The reason can be traced to two parallel situations. First the entrenched section of upper caste continued to maintain their dominance through better education and capital resources. At the same time rise of a section of lower caste due to affirmative action ate the other pie of benefits. Thus the relatively poorly placed upper caste people were pushed to lower runs of poverty and subjugation and remains in states of apathy.

Fourthly, the less visible and numerical weaker small but equally subjugated sections of society like the transgenders have continued to live off the radar of state positive discrimination.

Thus the current form of society is entirely in contrast to the egalitarian dream of constitution formers. The current condition is an example of complexly placed and interlinked hierarchies where socially higher group may not enjoy similar economic privileges and vice versa.

The reason of this perpetual inequality in form or another is the continued push for inequality by various stakeholders through providing equality of opportunity to unequally placed sections of society.

This situation calls for a reform which can be no less than the freedom struggle and process of constitution making, which is nothing short of a revolution.

A Revolution for transformation, equity to equality

A reform of this sort cannot be depended on the elected representatives but needs a collaboration of all the stakeholders, policymakers, citizens, civil society, judiciary and most importantly media as a enabled platform.

The process should begin by setting up a credible committee to consider the present dynamics of inequality perpetuating in society. One should not stick to traditional definitions and economic status but go beyond to identify sections like transgenders. This committee should conduct extensive discussion with all stakeholders before giving a recommendation.

Policy formulation should be done in a transparent manner with a long term approach, rather than just immediate remedy. ~~Graded action plans~~ should Cascading planning should be done with fixed provision to phase out reservation provision or realign it.

Butta placed sections entitled to positive discriminations should come forward realising the responsibilities towards society and give up their entitlements of benefits in favour of less privileged.

A element of dynamism should be brought into any affirmative action to frequently realign with changing times rather than keeping it for time long enough that it itself become negative discrimination.

Fight against inequality should not be restricted to the political and economic dimensions but should be started in social dimensions also. As it is most reluctant to change, this fight will be long lasting and needs comprehensive strategy.

In the end we should remember that our goal is not to make poor man rich or rich man poor , neither it is about making lower caste a higher caste or vice versa .

But it is about making each human equal to other human , to make humanity and inequality.
