Oscar awards are annual awards given by the United States Academy of Motion Pictures Arts and Sciences for excellent and outstanding achievement in various branches of film-making. The major awards are for best leading and supporting actor and actress, best direction, best screenplay and best film. Another special Oscar is given for the life-time achievement. These awards are considered the most prestigious international awards in the field of world cinema.

The award was instituted by the academy on 16 May, 1929 and named after Oscar Pierce of Texas who was a wheat and fruit grower. The Academy was founded by Louis B.Mayer in 1927 with an objective to prevent the creation of an union of actors and artisans. Another aim was to improve the image of the film industry by issuing awards for merit and distinction. Originally the award was intended to be a modest one with citations within the Hollywood film industry. But the importance of the award kept on increasing as broad media coverage generated widespread popular interest. Oscar award winning movies assured box-office success as was noticed from the increasing revenue of winning movies. Labelling of an Oscar worked like a trademark for the commercial success of a film.
