

If I Were the Principle of My College

If wishes were horses, they say, beggars would ride. Even then, there is no man without an ambition or desire. I have a strong desire to become the principle of my college where I am reading. I am sick of the lack luster attitude of my teachers. None of them appears to be full of any dedication or sense of duty. If I become the principle of my college I would change the entire complexion of things. First of all, I would recruit only the best and the most suitable person on the staff. They will be given contract jobs to be reviewed after every three years. The dead wood amongst the faculty would be weeded out in a phased manner. High motivation would be introduced amongst the teachers and the taught. A spirit of competition would keep everybody on their toes. A judicious system of prizes and punishments would improve the tone of the college. Teachers would be paid fat salaries but would be forced to put in their blood and sweat in their profession. I would thus change the entire climate of the college and make it a dynamic, progressive temple of learning.
